Content

How are our minds related to our bodies? Could it be true that all our actions have causes and yet we're also free agents, responsible for our lives and actions? What is knowledge (as distinct from merely true belief) and what can we really know – about the world around us, about other people, or about ourselves? How can we be confident we know what is right and wrong, just and unjust? And what would it take to live a morally good life?

These typical philosophical problems will appeal to those who believe that by sensitive, imaginative and informed rational argument we can develop our understanding of morality, politics, human nature, religion, art, science and language.
