- choosing the right angle for a story and choosing appropriate images, locations and sound
- writing and editing scripts for bulletins and news reports
- editing tapes and scripts using specialist software so that they fit exactly into a time slot
- presenting live or pre-recording, in a TV or radio studio or on location
- interviewing people, sometimes live on air, perhaps asking challenging questions
- liaising with colleagues in other locations to provide updates on local news stories
- specialising in a particular field such as politics, sport or popular culture.

- the demand for the job.

Starting salaries with a local news organisation may be around £15,000 a year. Trainees at the BBC earn £21,216 outside London and £25,776 within London. With experience this can rise to between £22,000 and £45,000 a year. Top broadcasting journalists in national or international news organisations can earn more than £80,000 a year. Salaries in television tend to be higher than in radio.

Conditions

- You might be indoors or outdoors – outdoor work could be in all weathers and conditions.
- You would work irregular hours including evenings, weekends and public holidays; shift work is common.
- You sometimes travel locally or abroad, with overnights away from home.
- You might be in challenging or dangerous locations (for example in a conflict zone or somewhere with extreme weather).
- You work to tight deadlines in a pressurised environment.

Getting In

Getting a start in broadcasting is harder than ever. Sometimes you have to take any job in the field, just to 'get a foot in the door' and make contacts. The three major broadcasters in Scotland are the BBC, STV and Channel 4. There are many local radio stations and some local television stations in Scotland. Some broadcast journalists have moved initially to get experience.

- There are no formal entry requirements, but many entrants have a degree or postgraduate qualification in journalism, broadcasting, radio, television, multimedia or online journalism.
- The BBC offers a journalism trainee scheme for people 18 and over who have some journalistic work experience but no specialist qualifications. See the 'More Information' section below.
- Channel 4 offer an Investigative Journalism Training Scheme for graduates interested in working in investigative broadcast journalism.
- The most common route in is by a degree or postgraduate journalism training course. Within Scotland there are degree and postgraduate degree courses in journalism at Edinburgh Napier, Glasgow Caledonian, Robert Gordon, Stirling, Strathclyde and the West of Scotland Universities. Entry to a degree is usually 4-5 Highers, plus National 5 English.
- The Broadcast Journalism Training Council (BJTC) accredits a number of courses. In Scotland these are the BA and MA Multimedia Journalism at Glasgow Caledonian University and the BA Journalism at the University of the West of Scotland.
- Many broadcasting journalists follow a route from local newspapers to local radio to national broadcasting.
- Employers expect you to have practical experience. You can get this through student, hospital or local radio or television.
- It helps to make a show reel to send on spec – make sure that the first 10-15 seconds is your best work. You must follow up with a phone call.
- For newspaper experience contact local or national newspapers. You may have to do several unpaid work experience placements (internships) before earning your first wage.

What Does It Take

You need to be:

- curious
- tactful but persistent
- resourceful and assertive
- observant
- honest and accurate
- articulate – with a good voice for broadcasting
- adaptable in writing style, able to read and summarise quickly
- able to work under pressure to tight deadlines
- good at working in a team.

- strong written and verbal communication skills
- an interest in news and current affairs

Training

- The BBC and ITV, as well as some independent companies, run in-house on the job training schemes. Competition for places is fierce.
- Channel 4 runs work experience, apprenticeship, graduate and scholarship programmes through its training arm 4talent. You would need to be willing to move around the UK.
- IT and social media experience is also required.

Getting On

- Many journalists now work with multimedia – in radio, television and online. Digital Audio Broadcasting (DAB) has opened many new opportunities across radio and television.
- Most work freelance, on short term contracts. You may have to move to get your next job.
- Permanent contracts are rare.
- You usually start off working in the newsroom.
- If you get a long term contract you can seek promotion to a senior post as sub-editor, news producer, programme editor or special correspondent.

More Information

The Journalism Diversity Fund was set up by a number of different organisations involved in journalism and is run by the NCTJ. It aims to support the training of people from ethnically and socially diverse backgrounds. Bursaries may be awarded to individuals applying for National Council for the Training of Journalists (NCTJ) accredited courses. For more information visit the Journalism Diversity website.

The Guardian Media Group's, Scott Trust Bursary Scheme also offers a number of bursaries to postgraduate students each year, to study newspaper, web or broadcast journalism.

The BBC offer a paid Journalism Trainee Scheme that lasts for 10 months. Training and work experience may be at any of the national or regional news centres in the UK, including Glasgow, Salford, Cardiff and Belfast. Places in Scotland are limited so you may have to be prepared to move to another area. To apply you must be 18 or over, have some work experience related to journalism, have an excellent grasp of social media in journalism and be a keen news follower in all its forms. Competition for places is fierce. See the BBC Trainee Schemes website for more details.
